Happy New Year!

2019! Where has the time gone since the turn of the Century?

I suppose I'm like most people who think that a New Year's resolution will make all the difference, only to be disappointed. But this year I am determined to get the information on all those pesky bits of paper put into a 'programme' that will spew out records and reports on demand.

The snippet Frances dropped in her article in the last newsletter about finding the reference to 'Lane End' on Roots Magic, inspired me! An then Colin, this month on page 3, colour coding the generations for his family tree at Christmas, has strengthened my resolve. Roots magic - here I come!

As promised at the last Branch meeting, This issue contains lan Barbour's interesting article about his grandfather, John Barbour.

Scottish Researchers Alert! Graeme McKenzie's visit presents a great opportunity to hear an expert on Scottish genealogy. Our website contains details of the programme, times and venues. See page 2.

Remember that we have a subscription to TheGenealogist on our computers at the APFHC. If you have Worcestershire research, TheGenealogist has just added 144,000 individuals to their transcriptions.

Other new records include additions to the UK Headstones transcriptions, some of the more noteworthy being highlighted in their article:

https://www.thegenealogist.co.uk/featuredarticles/2019/thegenealogistadds-to-its-headstone-collection-to-reveal-some-fascinating-celebrities-1038/

Daytime members - don't miss the change of date from the 3rd to 4th Wednesday of the month, same time and venue.

Christmas trees and Family trees

This Christmas my wife and I hosted three generations of our family, which seemed like a good opportunity to set up a rough and ready family tree alongside the Christmas tree - one of those 'never let a chance go by' moments that we genealogy-inclined people are prone to!

Knowing what a humongous amount of space and paper these things can take up if you get carried away, I gathered a heap of copy paper that had been used on one side and loaded up the printer.

Because my brother and my sister's son were with us, as well as our own sons, partners and children, I decided that my parents were the obvious choice to be centre stage. To make it easier for the family to grasp what they were looking at, I asked my RootsMagic family tree programme to colour-code my dad and his ancestors blue (our paternal line), and green for my mum's side (the maternal line), going back five generations.

In the row below dad and mum are myself and my siblings (in yellow fluoro – again, to draw the unfamiliar eye) with our spouses and, below us, our sons and daughters (in pink highlighter) and spouses/partners.

And in the bottom row are the great-grandchildren of my mum and dad – the real target of this exercise!

For each person I just included birth and death year, and place.

Considering it was very much a 'No.8 wire' piece of work and took up 2.5m of wall space, it created a good bit of fun and amazement from the younger generations - and the not-so-young!

Well worthwhile.

11th November 1918 - 100 years on

John Barbour 1889-1940

On Armistice Day, the IIth November 1918, Private John Barbour, 3/1684, was in hospital in Glasgow having contracted influenza while on leave from the Western Front, visiting his mother and father. The influenza pandemic swept around the world killing between 50 and 100 million people, which was approximately 5% of the world's population at that time.

John Barbour was born in 1889 in Glasgow, Scotland, and was the only child of James and Jessie Barbour.

James Barbour was the son of a tenant farmer at Lochwinnoch, just south east of Glasgow, who would have been 'moved off his land' during the second phase of the Scottish Clearances in the 1860's, at which time he shifted to Glasgow with his wife and children.

James married Jessie Brotherston and they had their only child, John Barbour, when they were in their forties.

John Barbour was educated in Glasgow and on leaving school took a job as a clerk until, at the age of 23, he decided to emigrate to New Zealand for, hopefully, a better life. John had an uncle living in Ashburton with whom he could stay when he got to New Zealand giving him some family connection in his new country. How sad his Mum and Dad must have been to see their only son leaving them and thinking they would never see him again. But they were probably pleased for John that he was going to have a better life in a new country.

John arrived to a New Zealand in 1913 that was in the early stages of European colonization having been settled by Maoris many years earlier. The world at that time was a very different place to the one we know today. Mainly horse and carts to get about, with only a few cars.

Working as a butcher in Ashburton, John set about establishing himself in his new country. However war was looming in Europe and in August 1914 Great Britain entered World War I. Loyalty to Great Britain, the homeland, was significant and young men rushed to volunteer to join the fight. The word was "it will be over by Christmas" and that it would be a real adventure to travel to the other side of the world to fight. How wrong was that?

John Barbour volunteered in September 1915 and chose to join the No3 New Zealand Field Ambulance with his training in Palmerston North, before heading overseas in February 1916. The fateful Gallipoli campaign was lost by then and New Zealand soldiers had suffered heavy losses.

By the middle of 1916 John Barbour was posted to the Western Front in France.

The No3 Field Ambulance was embedded with the New Zealand Rifle Brigade. The role of the Field Ambulance was to stretcher the wounded back from the trenches and provide appropriate medical help before they were moved to Field Hospitals, well back from the front lines.

Being this close to the front line, the Field Ambulance suffered many losses to enemy fire, with their dressing stations often ahead of their own artillery putting them right in the middle of battle.

The Field Ambulance were active on the front line for the major battles of the Somme late 1916, in early 1917 the battle of Messines, and Passchendaele in late 1917.

John Barbour would have experienced life and death on a daily basis and would have seen the horrors of war first hand, being exposed to injuries and death that no human being should have had to face.

The Field Ambulance "just got on with it" doing the best they could to save lives and treat those who had died with dignity and respect. John was on the Western Front for two and half years and it is beyond comprehension how he would have felt - brave, scared, lonely, bold, no words can describe. No doubt, through his actions and bravery men's lives were saved.

While on leave in Glasgow in November 1918, visiting his parents, John contracted influenza and was admitted to hospital in Glasgow from where he witnessed Armistice Day on the 11Th Nov 1918. John battled influenza in various military hospitals over eight months until he was able to return to New Zealand in July 1919.

History tells us that the returning soldiers were treated poorly, unable to get jobs and left to keep to themselves the horrific experiences they had had of war. Their experiences would have scarred them deeply for life.

Not able to settle back in Ashburton, John moved to Dunedin where he meet and married Eliza (Gramps) Blythe. Eliza's first husband had died in 1920 at the age of 36 from pneumonia. Eliza was left with her four young children Doris 5, David 4, William 2, and Joy, less that a year old. Young David was to die in 1921 from appendicitis.

John Barbour married Eliza in 1922 and their only child "Jack" was born later in the year.

As a new family they moved to Roxburgh. Through the 1930's the world suffered the Great Depression with economies collapsing in most civilized countries. This meant work was almost impossible to find and supporting a family was a real struggle. John was one of the lucky ones who managed to get a job, but things were still very tough with four children to feed.

Many who had emigrated from Great Britain were left wondering if life would indeed get any better. By the late 1930s the depression was coming to an end and things were looking better for the future.

The household included four children and to them their Dad, John, would have spoken with a heavy Scottish accent. John worked hard to provide for and nurture his family. The late 1930s were the best years for the family but with war again looking likely in Europe the "good years" were short lived.

John Barbour died of a heart attack while at work in Roxburgh in 1940. His untimely death at the age of 52 was undoubtedly due to his weakened heart from the influenza he suffered at the end of World War I. John did not live to see his son, Jack, stepson William and son in law "Bill" go off to World War II. Would he have wanted to see that?

Eliza (Gramps) went on to live to ninety-two and her life is another story.

Fern, Murphy, Joey, Addison, Caitlyn, Sammy, Noah and Caelan -

You can be very proud of your great-great-grandfather, John Barbour. When it comes to remembering those who fought and the many who gave their lives for our free world, you, as great-great-grandsons and great-great-granddaughters can stand tall knowing your family history is something worthy of remembering.

I am sure John Barbour would, in turn, be proud of you in acknowledging and appreciating your family's background, knowing you are looking to the future with confidence and a loving kindness to all fellow human beings.
